3. If I Receive Government Assistance, What Are Affordable Addiction Treatment Options?

If you receive some form of government assistance and are looking for treatment options for addiction, you might be wondering what affordable options are available. Does receiving government assistance make you eligible for any help? What affordable or low-cost treatment options are available for you to explore? Receiving government assistance doesn't necessarily mean that you're not working, but it most likely means that you need financial help to pay your usual expenses. This means that you will probably struggle to come up with enough money to pay for addiction treatment on the spot. However, you are not alone in this, and there are various options available that can make treatment affordable.

Government-Funded Options for Addiction Treatment

There are some government programs and funding options that might be available for people who need addiction treatment. Whether you are eligible for them can depend on a number of factors, including your age, health, location, income, and more.

Some of the options that can help you to pay for addiction treatment are:

- State-funded substance abuse and detox addiction treatment programs.
- Grants from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA).
- Medicare or Medicaid.
- The U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs – the MISSION Act.
- The Affordable Care Act (ACA).

In addition to these government-funded options, there might be other ways you can find affordable addiction treatment if you receive government assistance. For example, many addiction treatment centers offer affordable payment plans that can make treatment more affordable.

State-Funded Addiction Rehab

Funding from both the federal and state level can provide free or affordable treatment for substance abuse problems. This allows states to offer treatment through their own rehab centers, which might include inpatient or outpatient treatment, as well as follow-up support. Much of the care offered through these programs consist of detox treatment or outpatient treatment, although some inpatient treatment is available. The treatment methods used might not be as up-to-date compared to other options, or offer the same amenities or benefits.

The requirements to be eligible for these programs may include being resident in the state, showing that you can't afford other treatment, and providing information about the addiction. There can often be a waiting list to access these programs, but they also help a lot of people.

SAMHSA Grants

Grants from the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration can also help people to receive addiction treatment. They are a federal source of funding to help states pay for drug and alcohol abuse treatment. These grants are often aimed at specific groups, such as pregnant or postpartum women, IV drug users, or people at risk of HIV. They can also be used to help pay for treatment for people who don't have insurance.

Medicaid and Medicare

Medicaid and Medicare both pay for medical costs based on income or age and disability, respectively. Medicare Part A, Part B, and Part D can help to pay for substance abuse treatment. They can cover inpatient and outpatient treatment, and are also available to help pay for partial hospitalization. Medicaid might be able to cover addiction treatment, but it depends on the state. If you are eligible for Medicaid, the insurance coverage is required to include substance abuse treatment as part of the ACA expansion.

Veterans Affairs Assistance

Many veterans struggle with addiction issues and other mental health problems. The U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs provides substance abuse treatment coverage. The VA provides information on what this cover may include, such as screening, inpatient or outpatient care, detox, counseling, self-help groups, and more. You can contact your VA health provider or local Vet Center, as well as call the VA's general helpline to find out more information.

Affordable Care Act (ACA)

Policies with the ACA, including both private insurance policies and Medicaid, are required to include treatment for substance abuse and addiction. There are various services covered, and patients can't be denied due to a pre-existing condition to substance abuse disorder. Government subsidies may also be available for those with no income or low income.

Help from Treatment Providers

Addiction treatment providers, including those offering intensive outpatient treatment and inpatient treatment, may also be able to help you to afford addiction treatment. In addition to accepting different insurance providers, Medicaid and Medicare, many will offer affordable payment plans for treatment. This helps to make treatment programs more affordable and accessible.
