

Back On The Road – Driving After A DUI If You Go To Rehab

Driving Under the Influence (DUI) is at the top in the list of road accidents caused. A lot of drivers continue to drive while intoxicated despite the laws put in place to curb this menace. There are different consequences of being caught driving under the influence, and they include;

- A jail time
- Monetary fine mainly for first offenders
- License suspension

The punishment of being charged with DUI mainly depends on the circumstance. Causing a fatal accident while drunk will be interpreted as vehicular manslaughter and it might result in a prolonged jail term. The court can also direct you to go to a rehabilitation facility for a stipulated period of time. The objectives of being sent into a rehab include:

- Help you deal with the substance abuse problem
- A chance to show you are remorseful
- An opportunity to understand that driving under the influence is dangerous
- A way to help you get your driving license back

How Going to Rehab After a DUI Offense Can Help You Get Back on the Road

Most people are able to deal with alcoholism after going into rehabilitation centers for the time stipulated by the court. You have to complete the program before the court can decide whether you will be getting your license back.

This is helpful considering the inconveniences that come with being denied the right to use your license. You cannot drive your car, and this can cause a lot of problems, especially if you are a busy person who requires driving to work or for other engagements.

Requirements After the Suspension to get Back on The Road

Driving after a DUI if you go to rehab requires that you abide by certain conditions. This means that after the suspension of your license, you have to do certain things to convince the court that you have repented for your mistakes.

You need to ensure that you do not get behind the wheel any time you are intoxicated. If you drive while the alcohol percentage in your blood is above 0.8 percent, your punishment will be stiffer.

You also need to accept random drug tests. These are tests done to ensure that you have not gone back to using alcohol and other substances, which might impair your ability to drive correctly. Failure to agree to the tests can result in losing your license again through suspension or other punishment forms.

How To Go Into a Rehab After Getting a DUI

Most DUI offenders get guidance and directions on the rehab they should enroll in. There is no liberty to dictate the rehab center which you should work with. Some centers provide accommodation where you can board on a full-time basis. You can also enroll in a rehab where you will be attending the sessions from your home.

The rehabilitation center administrators have to keep records to prove that you attended all the sessions without failure and without going back to using substances such as alcohol. Therefore, enrolling in a rehabilitation center is among the ideal ways of getting your license back after being charged with DUI.
